COMETS AND METEORITES: SOME FAMOUS DR. O.'S QUOTES AND A POSSIBLE ANSWER TO MYSTERIOUS LIMPING DOGS AND PUNCTURE WOUNDS IN CATS.

WE ARE NOT ACCEPTING NEW CLIENTS OR ADMITTING FORMER CLIENTS WHO HAVE NOT BEEN INTO THE PRACTICE IN THE LAST THREE YEARS!

(Reprint) Between July 16 and July 22, 1994, fragments of the comet Shoemaker-Levy 9 slammed into the southern hemisphere of the planet Jupiter. These fragments of the doomed comet hit the planet at over 50 miles per second. Some of the fragments were over a mile in diameter! And even though Jupiter itself is a gaseous giant, the impact of the comet with the planet ejected millions of tons of small fragments into our Solar System. Many of these fragments have—and will continue to do so for another million years—fallen to the earth in the form of meteorites.

I can hear it out there now: "Doc, have you gone over the edge? (Probably one too many irate clients or nasty anal gland squeezin's to the face!) What in the world could meteorites, limping dogs, and mysterious foot wounds in cats possibly have to do with one another?" Fear not, most-treasured clients. All will be crystal clear in no time.

In a class in statistics that I took during my undergraduate days at college (which I absolutely hated!), the first of two axioms (fundamental theories) that really stuck in my then frazzled brain, and which I often love to quote is: "If there is no possible way of knowing for certain the answer to a question, then there is no point in asking the question." The second axiom that I learned at the same time that's sort of along the same line of reasoning is: "If there is the slightest chance that an event can occur, then given enough time, it will."

Once again, I can hear it the concerned cries of the confounded: "Great quotes, Doc, but what in the heck does it all mean?" Most-beloved readers, what these elegant words mean is that if the question you are asking of yourself (or me) is such that no one can never be sure of what the right answer is, then any answer that anyone comes up with will be as valid as any other. For example, often a loving pet owner will bring in their dog and cat with an ailment such as favoring a front leg or perhaps with a laceration or puncture wound to their foot. And more often than not, these infirmities have a sudden onset with no idea of how they happened.

Most of the time, these maladies are easily treated with rest or simple suturing or just plain antibiotics. The problem, however, is that frequently the owner's office visit doesn't end here. And this is because of a baffling and sometimes very frustrating quirk of human nature. That is, there is something in us human beings/pet owners that insists in our having to know the precise reason how the pet's wound/injury happened. "Doc, do you think Rover could have been hit by a car?" "Doc, do you think Fluffy could have been bitten by a weasel?" "Doc, do you think he could have stepped on a broken beer bottle?" "And on and on and on." Sometimes it pains my heart so badly to just simply standby and watch worried owners drive themselves crazy with these unanswerable questions, that I must bring out my "big guns."

Occasionally, in order to prevent this questioning owner from any further mental anguish, I'll first start by volunteering a possible answer to the pet's problem of my own. With great respect, and in the uttermost seriousness, I'll say, "Sir/Madame, maybe when that comet slammed into Jupiter in the last century, it threw off a big chunk of itself into outer space. This lump of rock then aimlessly wandered around in our solar system until the earth's gravity grabbed a hold of it. This caused the rock to fall to our planet as a meteorite. Then, after falling through the atmosphere, it bounced off the ground, and hit your dog in the butt, which caused him to slip on a banana peel, bump into a tree, bruise his left shoulder, causing him to limp. (Or in the case of the cat with the foot laceration, the meteorite hit the beer bottle that some irate threw out of the window of her Volvo, and the poor animal had the misfortune of stepping on it.) It is at this point that I enlighten the compassionate owner with the two above quotes.

If this doesn't end the questioning, I'll then ask a question of my own. "Dear Madame or Sir, have you asked the cat/dog yet what happened?" This question usually results in an abrupt and quizzical silence. Then, before the hapless owner has a chance to respond, I instantly follow the question up by literally asking the same question of the dog/cat. I'll bend down with my ear to the critter's muzzle (making sure the cat or dog isn't the biting type) and I lovingly ask them, "What happened?"

And dear reader, in a little over 20 years of being in the veterinary healing profession, not a single dog or cat has given me a reply.
